As you travel along the river from Juliette to the confluence, you can still observe ancient Indian settlements, foundations of abandoned grist mills, and sometimes the skeleton of a century-old steam boat. This water shed supplies Georgia cities with over 100 million gallons water per day for hydroelectric power, manufacturing, fresh drinking water, and recreational activities. The Ocmulgee River is rich in the history of an early Georgia and will remain of extreme importance to the Georgia of the future.

The bottom land forests were rich in a diversity of plant and animal life. During the high water levels of the winter months, 1900s, steamboats became the life line to deliver supplies and gather goods, especially cotton, from the plantations along the river. In high water times, steamboats could travel to Macon, but at normal water levels, they stopped at Hawkinsville. Pole boats were then pushed upstream to Macon.

With this western progress, river travel became important to the development of middle Georgia. From the 1820s to the early 1900s, steamboats became the life line to deliver supplies and gather goods, especially cotton, from the plantations along the river. In high water times, steamboats could travel to Macon, but at normal water levels, they stopped at Hawkinsville. Pole boats were then pushed upstream to Macon.

The headwater of the Ocmulgee River begins at Lake Jackson, which was created at Juliette with the merging of the Alcovy River, the South River, and the Yellow River. From this beginning above Macon, the Ocmulgee River meanders over 240 miles to the confluence with the Ocmulgee River below Lumber City, where it then continues 137 miles to the Georgia coast as the Altamaha River. During its southerly flow, the Ocmulgee River drainage system covers over 6,100 square miles and 30 counties serving more than 4 million Georgians. The Ocmulgee has played a central role in Georgia's history, more than 17,000 years. Research on the river's southern portion in Telfair County indicated a possible visit in the 1500s of the explorer Hernando de Soto. During Georgia's western development in the early 1800s, the river served as the border between the Creek Indians in the south with the settlers on the northern river bank.
